13. Distinguished Lecture Series in Computer Science, Friday, Oct 29, 2:30. Prof. Erik Demaine, MIT: "Origami Robots and Star Trek Replicators"

Distinguished Lecture Series in Computer Science, Friday, Oct 29, 2:30-3:30, in CEWIT 200, featuring world renown Prof. Erik Demaine, of MIT (<http://erikdemaine.org/>) "Origami Robots and Star Trek Replicators"

Science fiction is a great inspiration for science. How can we build reconfigurable robots like Transformers or Terminator 2? How can we build replicators that mass-produce a given shape at the nano scale? Recently we've been exploring possible answers to these questions through computational geometry.

One approach to reconfigurable robots, based on computational origami design, is to build a sheet of material that can fold itself into desired shapes.

Going down to the nano scale, we need to work with much simpler parts, actuated by Brownian motion, van der Waal forces, etc.

I will describe the algorithms and geometry underlying all of these ideas, as well as our early attempts at implementing them in practice.
